Function words are words that perform grammatical functions in language structure. In the Karakalpak language, there are many types of function words that each of them has a different function. They participate in connecting words and sentences, showing the relationship between them, clarifying the meaning of individual words and adding additional meaning to them. [4,8b]

From the grammatical term "function word" we understand words that are not used independently and have no lexical meaning or have lost their lexical meaning. Although such words do not have a specific lexical meaning, they play a significant role in connecting the words in a sentence, expressing the artistic use of thought, enhancing the meaning of words, and connecting them [4,234b].

Function words are a type of part of speech that has lost its original lexical meaning and definitively transitioned to auxiliary function. However, their lexical meanings have become completely obscured over the last periods and their usage in the language faces with significant changes. As a result, they lose their original lexical meanings and express only abstract grammatical meanings [1,3b].

In some function words have more lexical meaning than grammatical meaning. Because the lexical meanings of such auxiliary words are preserved in some sentences. Therefore, such groups of function words are used either as content words that are included meaningful words or sometimes as auxiliary words [3,381b].

In other sources and books of other old languages, the function words are also referred to as auxiliary words or Sap kómekshi sózler in Karakalpak language.

It is clear that auxiliary words or simple function words are a grammatical category that was established a long time ago in the language. From a historical perspective, all auxiliary words originated from meaningful words, specifically from old singular nominal forms and verb forms. Over time, through frequent usage and repeated combinations in phrases, these words have evolved to be used in their current function [3,381b].

Simple function words refer to a group of auxiliary words that are not used independently and have no lexical meaning on their own. They are added to meaningful words, contributing various additional meanings and concisely connecting sentences [5,235b].

Thus, this definition that mentioned above is totally the same with the rule of function words in Karakalpak language.

Function words are often morphologically immutable and do not possess the word formation [5,541b].

Therefore, function words do not have a definite and stable meaning, but within a sentence they combine the words with lexical meaning and perform a grammatical function.

Function words appear somewhat similar to case affixes in their usage. In other words some function words are as similar as case affixes. However, they are distinguished from affixes by being in the form of a single word [1,4b].

Some function words retain in their full lexical meaning. In such cases, these words are not attached to other meaningful words instead of they can be used independently. There are the main characteristics of function words:

1. They do not express a complete lexical meaning on their own as they are auxiliary grammatical meaning is realized only when combined with meaningful words.
2. Function words do not change by adding word-changing and word-forming suffixes.
3. Function words are not as a sentence member.

Function words are divided into three categories based on their grammatical meaning and function in Karakalpak language. They are tirkewishler, danekerler, janapaylar . [2.219] In English they are like prepositions, conjunctions and auxiliary verbs. Therefore, even if function words do not have a lexical meaning, they remain within the sentence. It connects simple sentences with other sentence members and serves a grammatical function.

Function words are called in school grammar, as well as in some scientific works, only as the words without a specific lexical meaning. They are the words "Служебные части речи" in the Russian language is being taken as auxiliary or function words. Thus, function words are divided into three categories: tirkewish, dáneker, janapay. However, in addition to these words, auxiliary verbs and auxiliary nominative words are closely related to function words in their general meaning, although they are considered among verbs and nouns [4,234b].

Thus, function words give grammatical information about other words in a sentence or clause, and cannot be isolated from other words. Function words help us connect important information. Function words can be critical for understanding, but they add little meaning beyond defining the relationship between two words.
